Chang and Eng Bunker (1811 – 1874) were Thai-American conjoined twin brothers whose condition and birthplace became the basis for the term "Siamese twins".

In 1829, Robert Hunter, a Scottish merchant who lived in Bangkok, saw the twins and realized their potential. He paid their parents to permit him to exhibit their sons as a curiosity on a world tour. When their contract with Hunter was over, Chang and Eng went into business for themselves.

From inside the book:

"The pamphlets concerning Chang-Eng, which have been published previous to this time, were written before the period at which they became of age, and also before they understood the English language. Under these circumstances, the present statement has been written with their knowledge, and under their supervision. Great care has been taken to render it as correct as possible, and the account of their journeyings has been brought down to the present date.

"It is deemed proper to state, that the present publication is made for a two-fold purpose : in the first place, and more particularly, to correct any erroneous statements which may have occurred in previous publications ; and secondly, to convey to the public some idea of the immense expanse of country which they have encompassed in the last few years."

Originally published in 1838; may contain an occasional imperfection.
