Chinese Foreign Policy During the Cultural Revolution Barbara Barnouin, Yu Changgen

Focusing on latter phase of the Cultural Revolution, the authors highlight the contradictions of a period that was marked by incendiary rhetoric about threats of the outside world and increasing concern over China's isolation on the world stage. Paying close attention to China's diplomatic ties with the United States, the Soviet Union, and Japan, the study examines the practical considerations that led China to open up relations with the West, even while increasing radicalization ran rampant at home.
